company Mormon gold-seekers. The gold-seekers were eager to trade animals and sell their household goods, books, clothing, fine linens and silks. Survival was the goal, not luxury. They needed grain ground into flour and meal. Broken wagons and harnesses needed repairing. Mormon ferries on major streams earned money ferrying west-bound wagons.

1850 brought twice as many gold-seekers through Utah, and the experience was repeated. Further benefiting Utah's settlers. About 1,000 wintered in the valley that year, earning lodgings and food by farm and community work. The gold-seekers needed the third year, and only 5,000 crossed through the valley in 1851.

Five years after arrival of the first pioneer company Mormon gold-seekers.

The tragic event is known historically as the Mountain Meadows Massacre. When smoking guns of Indians and whites ceased firing that September, 1857, upwards of 120 Arkansans and Missouri emigrants, including women and older children, lay dead in the meadows of southwestern Utah—treacherously slain.

A series of unfortunate circumstances had serious bearing on the tragedy. The Utah pioneers had learned, while celebrating the tenth anniversary of their arrival in the valley, that a federal army was approaching to unseat Governor Young and control the people who allegedly were defying the U. S. government. False accusations had resulted in what became widely known as "Buchanan's Blunder."
